

Patel Processing — New Office Reveal

Cinematic Brand Film Script

Prepared: July 29, 2026 Working title: "The Move" Target runtime: 90 seconds (hero cut) — see Section 2 for a 60-second alternate cut guidance Tone reference: The Godfather (weight, quiet authority, a family closing ranks) crossed with Peaky Blinders (sharp tailoring, moody amber/blue lighting, a slow-motion power walk, a brass-and-strings score that builds rather than explodes). This is a mood and a visual grammar to borrow — not literal crime-drama content. No weapons, no threats, no criminal framing. The "gangster" feeling comes entirely from confidence, tailoring, lighting, and restraint, not from anything the characters actually do or say.

A note on names: the script below casts three placeholder executives — swap the names and titles for your actual leadership before shooting. I've leaned into the Patel name for the founder/CEO role since it does real dramatic work (a patriarch figure, a name on the door), but change it freely if it doesn't match who's actually in that chair.

1. The script

FADE IN.

SCENE 1 — INT. OLD OFFICE, BOARDROOM — NIGHT

Rain streaks a window. The city glows, small, through the glass. The room is handsome but modest — the kind of room a company outgrows. A single low lamp. Everything else in shadow. Three silhouettes at a long table. Smoke curls from a glass of something amber, untouched, more atmosphere than prop.

RAJ PATEL (CEO/Founder, 50s, still, unhurried — the kind of stillness that makes a room quiet down on its own) sits at the head of the table, jacket on, tie loosened by exactly one inch. He's not looking at anyone. He's looking at the city.

RAJ (quiet, almost to himself) Ten years ago this view was the whole plan.

A beat. NADIA SHAH (COO, 40s, sharp, economical with movement) turns a pen slowly between two fingers — not nervous, deliberate.

NADIA And now it's the smallest room in the building.

RAJ almost smiles. Doesn't quite.

ARJUN MEHTA (VP of Growth, early 30s, the youngest at the table, the one still hungry enough to say the thing out loud) leans forward into the light for the first time.

ARJUN We didn't build this to stay comfortable.

Silence. The rain gets a little louder. RAJ turns from the window, finally looks at the table — at both of them, like he's deciding something he already decided a while ago.

RAJ Then we stop being comfortable.

He stands. The chair doesn't scrape — it's the kind of room where nothing scrapes. He buttons his jacket. One motion, economical, final.

RAJ (continuing) Get the floor ready.

CUT TO BLACK.

SCENE 2 — TRANSITION

A close, deliberate image — not a cliché match-cut, something with real texture:

A hand turns a key. Not a car key — an oversized, ceremonial-feeling key, or a keycard held like one. The lock clicks. Light floods in from the edges of frame before we see the room.

(Alternate transition, if a literal key feels too on-the-nose: a single elevator button being pressed — the number is high, and it's the top of the panel. The doors close on darkness. When they open again, it's Scene 3.)

SCENE 3 — INT. NEW OFFICE, LOBBY — DAY (GOLDEN HOUR)

Light — real light, floor to ceiling. The contrast from Scene 1 should be felt in the body before it's understood: this room breathes. Marble, brass fixtures, the Patel Processing mark cut into the wall in real dimension, not a decal.

RAJ, NADIA, and ARJUN walk in together, three abreast, unhurried — the Peaky Blinders power-walk energy, but corporate: tailored coats, no rush, the room seems to make way for them rather than the other way around. Shot low, slightly behind, so the space itself dwarfs and frames them.

No dialogue in this section. Let the room talk. A confident, building orchestral/brass score carries it — see Section 3 for music direction.

MONTAGE — THE NEW FLOOR:

- A wide shot of an open floor, sunlight cutting across empty desks not yet occupied — full of implied future, not people yet.
- NADIA's hand trailing along a boardroom table longer than the entire boardroom from Scene 1.
- ARJUN, alone for a beat, looking out over the skyline from a floor high enough that Scene 1's "whole plan" view is now something they're looking down at.
- RAJ, last, standing in a doorway — his name, or the company's, on the glass behind him, slightly out of focus, so it reads without being read.

Building to one final wide shot: all three, small in the frame, standing in the center of the new floor, the whole space around them. Held a beat longer than feels comfortable — let the room be the star of the last image, not the people.

SCENE 4 — CLOSE

Cut to black. A beat of silence — the score drops out entirely for one second before the final sting.

TITLE CARD (clean, minimal, no flourish — let the film's weight carry it):

PATEL PROCESSING [tagline — see Section 4 for options]

FADE OUT.

2. Two cuts, one shoot

90-second hero cut (as scripted above) — for the website, investor/partner decks, and a proper LinkedIn/YouTube post where the pacing has room to breathe.

60-second alternate cut — trim Scene 1's dialogue to just Raj's two lines ("Ten years ago this view was the whole plan" / "Then we stop being comfortable — get the floor ready") and let Nadia's and Arjun's lines become reaction beats instead of spoken lines. The transition and new-office montage stay intact almost entirely — that's the section doing the actual emotional work, and it's the section most worth protecting if the runtime has to come down.

3. Music direction

The score is doing as much work as the dialogue in a film like this — treat it as a real line item, not an afterthought.

- Scene 1: Sparse. A low string drone or a single piano figure, restrained — think the quiet, coiled-tension cues under a Godfather conversation scene, not a swelling theme yet. The room should feel like it's holding its breath.
- Transition: A single sustained note or a soft rise — the moment the score starts to commit to building.
- Scene 3 montage: This is where it opens up — a driving, brass-and-strings build in the Nick Cave/Peaky Blinders register (moody, a little bluesy, confident rather than triumphant-cheesy). Avoid a generic "corporate uplift" orchestral cue here — that's the fastest way to undercut the whole tone the rest of the film built.
- Scene 4: Full drop to silence for one beat before a short, confident final sting under the title card — not a fade-out of the same music, a deliberate hard landing.

(Licensing note: describe the reference tracks above to your composer/music supervisor as a style brief rather than trying to license the actual Peaky Blinders or Godfather scores — both are tightly controlled and expensive to clear. An original cue built to this description will read the same way to an audience without the clearance risk.)

4. Tagline options for the closing card

Pick one, or use as a starting point for your own:

- "Built for more."
 - "This is what building bigger looks like."
 - "The next chapter starts here."
 - "We didn't outgrow the vision. We outgrew the room." (directly pays off Raj's Scene 1 line — strongest option if you want the card to feel connected to the script rather than a generic sign-off)

5. Production notes

- Wardrobe: Sharp, tailored, contemporary business wear — the Peaky Blinders influence should live in the cut and confidence of the tailoring (three-piece suits, no tie-loosening-as-costume-gimmick beyond the one deliberate inch in Scene 1), not in period signifiers like flat caps or waistcoat chains, which would read as costume rather than mood.
- Lighting: Scene 1 should be almost entirely motivated by the single lamp and the window — let real shadow do the work rather than flooding the room with fill light. Scene 3 is the inverse: genuinely bright, real daylight if the space allows it, so the emotional contrast is felt physically, not just implied.
- Camera: Scene 1 — locked-off or very slow, almost imperceptible push-ins on dialogue; stillness sells the authority. Scene 3 — slightly lower angle, deliberate tracking alongside the walk, letting the architecture dominate the frame rather than cutting rapidly between faces.
- Casting/direction note: the whole tone lives or dies on restraint — direct the cast toward doing less, not more. A single unhurried gesture (buttoning a jacket, turning a pen) reads as far more powerful on camera than an expressive line reading. This is the single most important note to give on set.
- Where this lives after launch: the 90-second cut as a proper YouTube/LinkedIn post and internal town-hall opener; a 15-20 second cutdown of just the Scene 3 walk-and-reveal (no dialogue needed) works well as a standalone teaser in the days leading up to the actual move, posted with a simple caption and no spoilers on the full film.
