

RetailzPOS

Halloween monster-customers concept · Prepared September 2026

The concept

1. The monster lineup

The Vampire → Bloody Mary kit

The Werewolf → Moonshine

The Witch → Absinthe

The Mummy → Spiced rum

The Zombie → a “Zombie” cocktail

Frankenstein’s Monster → Red Bull vodka

The Grim Reaper → a smoky mezcal or peated Scotch

2. Format options

Flagship video (30–40 seconds)

Carousel

Seven-day drip series

Poll

Quote card

3. Direction notes

The concept

Classic Halloween monsters walk into the store as customers, each ordering something that thematically matches their persona — a vampire asking for a Bloody Mary kit, a werewolf asking for moonshine. The joke mechanically makes the point: seven completely different, oddly specific orders in a row is exactly the scenario a well-stocked, always-ready shelf is built for. Tagline: “This spooky season, be ready for any kind of customer.”

1. The monster lineup

The Vampire → Bloody Mary kit

Glides up to the counter, cape dramatic: “I’ll need everything for a Bloody Mary. Emphasis on the Mary.” Cashier already has the vodka, tomato juice, and garnish kit staged. The obvious pun, but obvious because it's perfect — the anchor monster of the set.

| The Werewolf → Moonshine

Scruffy, glances at the sky: "Full moon's out. Gonna need something that hits like moonshine — actually, just moonshine." Clean, one-beat pun (full moon → moonshine), and a real, specific specialty SKU that's easy to be caught short on.

| The Witch → Absinthe

Mysterious, cauldron energy: "Something green. Something strong. Something that turns you a little... funny." The smartest pairing in the set — absinthe's real folklore nickname is "The Green Fairy," a genuine historical tie to witch/potion mythology, not just a color joke. Good "did you know" caption material.

| The Mummy → Spiced rum

Shuffling, wrapped in bandages: "5,000 years wrapped up, and I still know good spice when I smell it. Spiced rum, please." Lesser-obvious but historically grounded — real mummification used aromatic spices (cinnamon, myrrh, frankincense).

| The Zombie → a "Zombie" cocktail

Groaning, shuffling in: "Braaaains— no, wait. Just a Zombie. The drink. Obviously." Self-aware gag — the "Zombie" is a real, famous tiki cocktail (a heavy rum blend), so the zombie ordering the drink literally named after it is the easiest, most satisfying punchline of the set.

| Frankenstein's Monster → Red Bull vodka

Flat affect, sudden spark: "Need something with a jolt. Whatever's got the most voltage." Clean electricity pun, and a nice tonal change of pace from the classic-cocktail energy of the other five.

| The Grim Reaper → a smoky mezcal or peated Scotch

Unhurried, scythe resting against the counter: "Not here for anyone in particular today. Just need something with a good finish." The sharpest pun in the set for anyone who actually knows spirits — “finish” is real tasting-note terminology (the lingering taste after a sip), and it’s also, unmistakably, the Reaper’s whole job description. Works best as the closing monster in any sequenced format — it’s the most deadpan, understated line of the seven, a good tonal comedown after Frankenstein’s jolt.

2. Format options

Flagship video (30-40 seconds)

One continuous bit at the same register — a different costumed “customer” walks up every 5-6 seconds, delivers their line, the cashier rings it up without missing a beat each time. The cashier’s deadpan competence is the joke. Cheap to shoot: one set, one cashier, seven quick costume changes. Running seven vignettes at ~5-6 seconds each puts the full cut closer to 40-45 seconds — if that runs long for the platform, the Grim Reaper is the easiest one to hold back for a stand-alone post instead, since its slower, quieter delivery doesn’t match the fast-cut rhythm of the other six as naturally.

Closing line: “You never know who’s walking in this spooky season. RetailzPOS makes sure you’re never caught without it.” End card: logo + “Book a demo.”

Caption: “Every customer’s a little different this time of year. Good thing the shelf doesn’t know the difference.”

Hashtags: #RetailzPOS #HalloweenMarketing #LiquorStoreLife #POSsoftware

Also runs on: Instagram Reels (primary), TikTok (mirror), Facebook (mirror, native upload).

Carousel

One monster per slide — order, one-liner, and a small “did you know” note where the lore is real (witch/absinthe, mummy/spices, Grim Reaper/finish). Final slide ties it to the actual feature: “Seven different customers, seven completely different orders — this is exactly what AI reorder alerts and case-break inventory are built for.”

Seven-day drip series

One monster a day through the week of Halloween instead of one big post — turns a single idea into seven days of content and builds a “which one’s next” curiosity loop, running Monday through Halloween itself. Save the Grim Reaper for Halloween day — its quieter, “not here for anyone in particular” line lands better as the actual closer than mid-week.

Poll

“Which monster’s order matches YOUR go-to drink?” — playful, zero compliance risk, doubles as real customer-preference signal.

Quote card

The tagline itself, standalone: “This spooky season, be ready for any kind of customer.” Gold text on Ink Charcoal, works independent of the video.

3. Direction notes

- Costumes can be cheap/minimal — a cape, a bandage wrap, green face paint — the writing and the cashier’s deadpan reaction are doing the comedic work, not production value.
- Keep every order phrased as a product/ingredient request, never as a joke about intoxication or overconsumption — each monster is buying ingredients for a drink they’d make at home, not drinking on camera. This keeps the whole bit squarely in the “clever shopping trip” territory rather than anywhere near a compliance concern.
- If shot as the continuous-take video, rehearse the cashier’s ring-up timing so each transaction actually looks fluid — the joke depends on the cashier never being thrown off, which visually sells “always stocked and ready” better than any line of dialogue could.