

RetailzPOS

A fun, quirky Halloween creative concept · IP-cleared v2 · Prepared September 2026

IP note on this version

The concept

1. Flagship Reel / TikTok script (30–40 seconds)
2. Carousel spin-off — “5 Ghosts Every Store Owner Has Seen”
3. Cheap, high-mileage extras from the same bit
4. Compliance note
5. The bigger swing (optional): a “Christmas Carol” mini-series

IP note on this version

This version replaces every element that referenced or evoked the Ghostbusters franchise (the name, the “who you gonna call” line, a proton-pack-style device, and any jingle tied to the actual theme song) with an original mechanic: RetailzPOS’s own handheld barcode scanner as the capture device. See the copyright discussion earlier in this thread for why — trademark and copyright risk is real when a commercial ad leans on a specific franchise’s name, catchphrase, or licensed music, even affectionately. The general “ghost gets banished” trope is a public trope nobody owns; nothing below needs the specific franchise to land the joke. This isn’t formal legal advice — get quick trademark/legal sign-off before wide distribution regardless, same as any compliance-sensitive content in this project.

The concept

A retired, flickering, dial-up-groaning ghost — the Ghost of POS Past — haunts a store owner with old-system nightmares (manual recounts, missed reorders, a skipped ID check, a customer who quietly stopped coming back). The owner’s own RetailzPOS handheld scanner becomes the hero prop: point it at the ghost like scanning an item, and the ghost gets rung up, bagged, and gone. Every joke maps to a real feature — this is the 3-Layer Method wearing a costume, not a departure from it.

Beat structure, reusable across every format below: haunting → flashback to the old-system nightmare → the owner grabs the scanner → a satisfying checkout “beep” → the ghost gets scanned and shrinks away → owner deadpans to camera.

Visual identity: a translucent-green, flickering specter styled as a dying CRT terminal or a floating cash register, draped in curling receipt-paper chains, groaning in dial-up-modem tones. Props: a floppy disk, a busted calculator, a “back in 20 min — doing inventory” sign taped to the door, and the actual RetailzPOS wireless barcode scanner as the capture device — no costume or prop needed beyond the real hardware.

1. Flagship Reel / TikTok script (30-40 seconds)

Time	Beat
0:00-0:03	Dark store, one flickering light. Text on screen: “Every store owner knows this ghost.”
0:04-0:10	The ghost rises from behind an old register, chained in receipt paper, moaning: “...no barcodes... count it by haaaand...”
0:11-0:18	Quick sepia/VHS-filtered flashback: a midnight case recount with a clipboard, a fake ID waved through, a regular walking out the door for the last time without anyone noticing.
0:19-0:24	Ghost looms in: “You’ll never eescape the manual reorder...”
0:25-0:28	Owner reaches under the counter and grabs the RetailzPOS wireless scanner, glowing gold. Beat of mock-serious determination.
0:29-0:34	Owner points the scanner at the ghost like scanning an item. A single, satisfying checkout BEEP . The ghost shrinks, sucked toward the scanner like it’s being rung up, and vanishes with a little “item added” chime.
0:35-0:40	A receipt prints out of frame. Owner glances at it, deadpan, and reads: ““1x Ghost of POS Past — returned.”” To camera: “Case-break inventory. Auto reorder. ID checks that don’t need a haunting to get right.” End card: “Book a demo — no exorcism required.”

Caption: “Every store owner has a Ghost of POS Past. Ours just gets scanned, bagged, and gone.”

Hashtags: #RetailzPOS #POSsoftware #LiquorStoreLife #HalloweenMarketing

Also runs on: Instagram Reels (primary), TikTok (mirror), Facebook (mirror, native upload).

Direction: Zero-budget VFX is fine and arguably funnier — a green color-grade filter, a real checkout beep sound effect, and a printed receipt sight gag carry the whole joke. No jingle, no proton-pack prop, no costume needed — the actual scanner and a real receipt printer are the entire effects budget. Don't over-produce it.

2. Carousel spin-off — “5 Ghosts Every Store Owner Has Seen”

Slide	Ghost	The joke	The fix
1	The Ghost of the Manual Recount	Haunts every Sunday night	Case-break inventory, auto-converted
2	The Ghost of the Missed Reorder	Appears right when the shelf goes empty	AI reorder alerts, based on real velocity
3	The Ghost of the Skipped ID Check	The one that still gives you a chill	Hard-block age verification
4	The Ghost of the Customer Who Never Came Back	And you never even knew	Moolah Points win-back automation
5	The Ghost of the Handwritten Invoice	Lost in a drawer somewhere	EDI invoicing, reconciled automatically
6 (CTA)	—	—	“RetailzPOS busts all five. Book a demo.”

Caption: “Every store owner’s seen at least one of these. Swipe to see all five — and how they get busted.”

Also runs on: Instagram (primary), Facebook (mirror), LinkedIn (adapted single-image summary).

3. Cheap, high-mileage extras from the same bit

Quote card: “I still hear the sound of the old card reader declining...” — campfire-ghost-story styling, gold text on Ink Charcoal.

Poll / Story: “Which POS ghost has haunted YOU?” — same five options as the carousel. Doubles as real pain-point research, same mechanic as the existing “what’s your biggest headache” poll in the Content Book.

UGC / duet bait — probably the highest-upside piece here: invite other owners to share their own real “POS ghost story.” Old-system horror stories are genuinely funny, and nearly every independent store has one — this is the kind of prompt that can spread store-to-store rather than needing paid reach.

“Ghost of POS Future” bonus (dark-comedy close-out for late October): a cautionary vision of a store that didn’t get saved — slowly losing customers to a competitor with better tech. Same beat structure, inverted ending: the owner reaches for the scanner too late, no beep, no rescue, just a fade to a “for lease” sign. Good, punchier closer for the week.

4. Compliance note

Keep “the Ghost of the Skipped ID Check” a vague, relatable fear (“the one that still gives you a chill”) rather than dramatizing an actual failed check in detail. This matches the existing standard elsewhere in the Content Book, where a similar near-miss scenario is explicitly labeled a composite, not a real event. Here, the joke format itself keeps it light — just don’t let a script draft get more specific than the one-liner above.

5. The bigger swing (optional): a “Christmas Carol” mini-series

The structure is already sitting there — Ghost of POS Past, Present, and Future — as a 3-episode arc that could start on Halloween and bridge straight into the November/December content already planned.

Episode	Theme
Past	The old-system nightmares above (Section 1-2)
Present	The fear that's still unsolved today — quiet customer churn, guessing on reorder timing
Future	A warning of falling behind a modernized competitor

The payoff: the “reformed Scrooge” owner ends up evangelizing RetailzPOS to other owners — a funny, full-circle closing gag.

Frame this as a deliberate wink (“we couldn’t wait until December for this joke”) rather than forcing all three episodes into one week. If this gets greenlit, it should be scripted as its own follow-up piece, timed against the holiday content calendar already in place (retailzpos-holiday-season-content-blog-plan-2026-09.md).