Trending now — 5 topics with a genuine brand angle

1	The NACS Show expo floor opens today — 1,200+ exhibitors across 435,000 sq ft, every one of them competing for attention in the Cool New Products Preview Room and beyond.	NACS Show — Expo	LinkedIn, buyer-education post. Not a booth pitch — the real signal-vs-noise problem: “Walk the floor today and almost every booth will say ‘AI-powered.’ The question that actually separates them: was this built for your category specifically, or bolted onto a general POS to check a box? Ask for a demo of the one workflow that matters most to your store, not the feature list.”

2	The federal hemp ban takes effect November 12, 2026 — a new total-THC standard (0.3% dry-weight, inclusive of THCA and delta-8) plus a 0.4mg-per-container cap is expected to make roughly 95% of current hemp-derived CBD products federally unlawful, with Congress still debating a delay.	Vicente LLP — 2026 Federal Hemp Ban: What It Means for the Future of Consumable Hemp Products	Instagram/LinkedIn carousel, urgent compliance post for CBD retailers. Plain and factual: “November 12 is the date to know if CBD is any part of your shelf — the new federal total-THC standard is expected to make most current hemp-derived products unlawful to sell. Know which SKUs on your shelf are actually affected now, not from a distributor notice in November.” No legal advice, no health claims — awareness and urgency only.
3	Columbus Day sales are quietly dying in retail — most brands have stopped running them entirely to avoid getting pulled into the Columbus Day/ Indigenous Peoples’ Day (Oct 12) culture-war crossfire, a shift industry groups have been making for several years now.	MR Magazine — Retailers Want Nothing To Do With Columbus Day	LinkedIn, a “what not to do” post. A short, practical note for owners still running an October calendar from a few years back: “If a Columbus Day promo is still on your calendar, this is a quiet week to drop it instead of running it. Most retail has already moved on — no upside in being the one place still leaning into a holiday everyone else backed away from.”

4	Ransomware is a small share of retail data breaches but most of the damage — 32% of 2025 retail breach insurance claims were ransomware, but it accounted for 61% of total losses, at a median $201,719 per incident, per Verizon's 2026 Breach Impact Study.	Chain Store Age — Verizon: Most Common Type of Retailer Data Breach	LinkedIn, security-education post. “Ransomware is one-third of retail data breaches but almost two-thirds of the dollar losses — a median $200K+ per hit. The question worth asking any POS vendor isn’t just ‘is my data safe,’ it’s ‘what happens to my store if your systems get hit, not mine.’ That’s a vendor-risk question, not a hypothetical one.” No product claims — a sharper question to ask, same pattern as our NACS Show post.
5	TikTok’s “Silent Review” challenge — reviewing a product, place, or experience entirely through facial expressions and text overlays, no dialogue, where the constraint itself drives the comedy.	CyberLink — 10 Trending TikTok Challenges in 2026	TikTok, format-jack for any vertical. “Silent Review: a fake ID at checkout” — played entirely through the cashier’s face and on-screen text, no dialogue, ending on the hard-block screen stopping the sale. Light, genuinely funny if executed well, zero overt pitch — the product moment is the punchline, not a tacked-on CTA.

Skipped, no genuine angle: the VHS filter, Spiderman makeup transition, “Touch It” challenge, and “$5 Challenge” TikTok trends — none had a retail tie that didn’t feel forced this week.

Compliance check: none of the above imply pricing, encourage overconsumption, or use underage-adjacent framing — #2 is pure regulatory-awareness content with no health or legal claims, #1 and #4 are vendor-question framing with no product pitch, #3 is cautionary marketing judgment, #5 is light format content with the compliance moment as the joke, not a sales pitch.
